hanged or hung?

Hanged is used only when referring to the hanging of a person by the neck with the intention of killing him or her.

In all other cases, hung is the past tense of hang.

The murderer is going to be hanged at dawn.

The murderer is going to be hung at dawn.

We hung your picture on the wall.

We hanged your picture on the wall.

What about “Hung, drawn, and quartered”, then? Shouldn’t it be “Hanged, drawn and quartered”?

No, and this is why: “Hanged” is used when a person is hung by the neck with the intention of causing death. Being hung, drawn, and quartered is a rather different, very grisly, way to die: the person is not intended to die from the hanging but instead—slowly, painfully, and with a great deal of mess—by being slit open so that his guts spill out, and then chopped up into quarters.
